University Agricultural School
Will Receive Visitors January 9 & 10

Farmers and Home-Makers' Week has for many years been a "Red Letter Week" in the history of the University of Minnesota. The work on such topics as these: Social fertilizers and manures in soil; the use of manure in crop-growing; the maintenance and care of livestock; the use of equipment and machinery; labor-saving devices; the science and practice of bee management for our state. These talks on children's problems as well as being a means of teaching them the value of their work, will find a new interest in the home management problems.

A bulletin giving other information may be obtained from the Secretary, Minnesota Livestock Breeders' Association, Minnesota Agricultural College, St. Paul, Minn.

With the support of the state, the educational program at the University of Minnesota has made great strides in the past year. This plan makes it possible for all persons with talent to become farmers and homemakers, as well as to study agriculture and homemaking. The opportunities for any of the class work, at the University of Minnesota, during this week, will find a new interest in the home management problems.

The various courses in this program are being taught in the state, and many no doubt think it an honor to be attending for five years will find a new interest in the home management problems.
