WHAT THE BUYER ASKS?

When the experienced dealer comes around to look at the cows you are offering for sale, he asks a number of questions. Here is a list of some of the questions he asks, with an answer to each one.

How much does it cost?

The answer is simply, "It depends." The cost of a cow is determined by many factors, including the breed, age, health, and production of the cow. A well-bred, healthy, high-producing cow will cost more than a younger, less-stable cow.

Is it registered?

It is common for the buyer to ask if the cow is registered with a breed association. This is important because registered cows are more likely to be of high quality and produce high-quality offspring. Non-registered cows, on the other hand, may be of lower quality and produce offspring of lower quality.

What is the cow's production record?

The buyer will want to see the cow's production record, which is a record of how much milk or other dairy products the cow produces in a given period of time. This record is important because it gives the buyer an idea of the cow's potential for producing milk or other dairy products.

Will the seller provide feed?

If the buyer is looking for a cow to be used for dairy production, they may ask if the seller will provide feed. This is important because feed costs can be a significant expense for a dairy farmer.

What is the cow's health history?

The buyer will want to know about the cow's health history, including any illnesses or injuries the cow has had in the past. This information is important because it can affect the cow's lifespan and productivity.

Will the seller provide transportation?

If the buyer is not located in the same area as the seller, they may ask if the seller will provide transportation. This is important because transportation costs can be a significant expense for a dairy farmer.

What is the cow's breeding history?

The buyer will want to know about the cow's breeding history, including which bulls the cow has been bred to in the past. This information is important because it can affect the cow's potential to produce offspring of high quality.

Can the buyer inspect the cow?

The buyer will want to inspect the cow before making a purchase. This is important because it allows the buyer to make an informed decision about the cow's quality and potential for producing milk or other dairy products.
