Most say work not only factor in determining living standards

A recent study by the Bankers Trust Co. has revealed that work is the most significant factor in determining living standards. The study, based on a survey of 1,500 households, found that the majority of respondents believed that work is essential to achieving a comfortable lifestyle.

Some respondents noted that work provides financial stability and security, while others emphasized the importance of work in maintaining a sense of purpose and identity. A few respondents expressed concern about the negative impact of work on personal life and relationships.

The study also highlighted the role of education and skills development in enhancing work opportunities and improving living standards. Respondents who had higher levels of education and job training tended to report higher levels of economic well-being.

Overall, the study underscores the significance of work in shaping individual and collective living standards. It suggests a need for policies that support workforce development, improve job opportunities, and promote a balance between work and personal life.

Pine Ridge Indians impatient

There is no escape for people entering the Pine Ridge Reservation, this group of some 70 persons remains outside the boundary Wednesday after the occupation of Wounded Knee by a band of militant Indians.

Deputy Asst. U.S. Atty. Gen. Roger J. Hellstern, of Rapid City, said an FBI fingerman was killed at Wounded Knee, and the Indian in question would not surrender.

Hellstern also said tribal police in Bannock, S.D., had warned of a "very strong" roadblock and he believed the roadblock was controlled by FBI personnel, to handle funeral arrangements.

Hellstern said a second round of talks between the government and tribal leaders was scheduled for Wednesday, but Wilson said there were no arrangements.

Chester Oakley, S.D., said a band of Indians stormed the village and evicted the tribal police. They want anyone in there," Hellstern said.

He said the government doesn't believe Clearwater is an AIM member, and that the group tried to storm the village and, at this point, want anyone in there.

"These people are conducting a peaceful march and we do not want them here," he said.

However, he said the government "will not be taken in by any smoke screen of AIM.

"...The government wants to end this occupation of Wounded Knee by a band of militant Indians."
